looking and popular. Yahe, he was the son of Shiresham's lending citizen and would one day become sole owner of, the Loring Textile mills.
It was hard to understand a girl who would pass up an offer like that.

and the season Kay must have decided to live and die an old maid, because no girl could possibly aspire higher than Chet Loring.

As a matter of fact, the folks of Shiresham were for once quite accurate in their guesswork.

Kay had resigned herself to do list what they predicted Live and old the season of the product of the season of a natural subbornness and independence of natural subbornness and independence of nature had not, a month after Chet's proposal. Ben Hosea of the Wallington Express propped into town one day to interview Loring senior concerning the possibility of a textile senior state of the senior senior concerning the possibility of a textile senior state to buy some cigarettes and found Kay Winthrop there.

One look at Kay and Mr. Hosea had an attack of goosepimples. He followed her out to her can and elimbed boildy aboard the running board.

Kay was to oprak.

"Have you ever been to China?" She sked.

"Have you ever been to China?" Thinking it over later, Kay marked at her acceptance of this body young man.

"Yet she knew that his her dreom, she had always wanted it that way." The had always wanted it hat way. The had always wanted the way of the product of having. Everyone told her had and the had always wanted the way of the Thursday night. It'll be more ex-citing."

Until Thursday Kay lived in a world of dreams and glorious ex-pectancy. When the time came she was waiting for him with her-sulteases packed and an eager, joy-ous look in her eyes.

"But the book! You'll write the book!"
"Of course, I will!"
He laughed, and there was recaptured hope and confidence in the sound he made. "It manyn't sell, though."
Well selling if we are having our adventure! If I doesn't we can always write another! And in the meantime well get along. Somehow."
"We'll get along." Ben repeated joyfully. "You and I together—in a far away places, in a strange country, among queer people. Just you and I on our glorious adventure. I—I guess wo only needed each other the get of the registration of the surface of the surfa
