RALPH strolled toward his cabin—his and Myron's. What a night! He'd been walking for hours along the cliffs by the water. That pungent smell of sea and sage—the sea was fairly drunk with it; and there lay Myron, sound asleep on their first night in California. Some guys don't sleep through anything. But Myron was still pretty weak after that last illness.

Ralph glanced at his watch. Two A. M., pretty late. "I'll creep in quietly and not disturb him," he thought. Second cabin door on the right; he could see it through the trees, the door ajar.

Now he was at the door, pushing it gently. Nary a squeak. Good. He removed his shoe and went in. Myron was a shapely mound upon the farther cot—breathing regularly. He could just discern him by the light that filtered in. Tip-toe around the bag—what a break that he'd remembered where they were. Pajamas? He pawed around the foot of the bed—nothing doing—well . . . The bedside chair—so far—good. He pulled off his clothes and slid into the empty cot.

Dawn was breaking when he became conscious of a weight against his chest.

"Say now, how many beds do you need?" he growled, throwing off the other's outflung arm. The next moment he drew back his hand as though he'd burned it. Barely six inches away, the prettiest girl he'd ever seen—and she was about to scream! In a flash he had her in a grip of steel, one hand pressed against her mouth. Helpless—she glared at him.

"Don't be frightened," he whispered fiercely. "I thought I was getting into my own cabin, with my brother. He's sick and I came in here—what's not to wake him? If you yell, we'll be thrown out tonight; they won't wait for an explanation. Try to understand. Now, if you believe me and won't scream and nod your head twice." She did as he asked, though her eyes were blue daggers.

Then, abruptly, he released her and ducked wildly beneath his covers. "If you'll get into the closet," he suggested faintly. "I'll get out. I couldn't find my pajamas last night."

Now the girl was sitting up, slipping on a kimono. She gave him one withering glance as she made for the closet and he dressed to the tune of her scornful laughter. Finally, stung by it: "I've been on my knees to you, darn you! Just the same, your door was open."

Once outside, he looked around. There it was, three down. A natural mistake. They all looked alike. "With luck I can still make it without waking Myron." But Myron was very much awake, and in fine fettle.

Soft lights—sweet music, and Nancy in his arms. "Did you ever see a dream walking?" She was a dream, dancing. When she was with someone else—stood by, content to watch and wait. He couldn't bear to break the spell. "Let's take a walk," he managed faintly.

"You looked so funny when you scurried down under the covers," she said, as though continuing an unbroken conversation. "But that was a dirty crack—about my door being open."

"I thought it would stop your laughing; otherwise you'd have roused the whole camp," he explained.

"Right—but you might have been very good speech. Hurry! Only 3:25. 32710 Grand River. 341-p

"I'll remember that in future," he grinned. "You bruise easily." Suddenly a stinging blow caught him on the left cheek.

"See if you bruise easily," he snarled, turning back. He stood there, stunned with anger.

Before he could catch his breath, she was back. "I shouldn't have done that," she said, in a low, ashamed voice, "you were nice about it all this morning when we were introduced. No wise cracks; no smirking. But I couldn't help it if you took what happened lightly. You didn't really—did you?"

"Say," he cried, "hit me again! Of all the unmitigated asses, I'm the world's champion. And I think you're the most glorious girl in all the world."

Suddenly she was in his arms. After a while, she pushed him away and looked at him with large eyes probing. "We haven't known each other very long—have we?"

"All our lives," he assured her. "Yes, the minute I laid eyes on you, I knew you were the one and only."

"Liar," she laughed. "You were too frightened to even look at me!"

"Oh, was I?" he snarled. "I was had on the snappiest pink pajamas I ever saw . . . but you might have been gentler," mockingly.

"I'm black and blue where you 'kissed' me. It stings and it hurts and while we're about it, how soon could we be married? I've a good job and a few assets."

"Sure, well wait till we're equalized."

"We've two weeks here, haven't we? And all eternity after that. Goodness, it hurts where you—mum, that's better."

Sulu Princess Gives Up Title to Many Islets

Colorful Philippine Moroland, where under the American flag live sultans, rajahs, princesses and imams, was brought closer to Manila when Dayang Dayang (princess) Hadji Pindang of Sulu signed documents renouncing long-standing land claims of the Sulu sultanate against the Philippine government.

Heirs to the late Sultan Jamalul Kiram II, the Dayang Dayang inherited the claims of the sultanate to various lands, including 70 islets in the Celebes sea as well as the people on them and the waters about them.

In renouncing the claims, the princess accepted an offer of the government, embodied in a law, to adjudicate to certain members of the Sulu royal house tracts of land of the public domain in the Sulu archipelago. Titles to these pieces of land accordingly will be issued by the commonwealth.

In the renunciations, however, the Dayang Dayang reserved her claims to exclusive ownership of 14 islets between Sulu archipelago and Borneo. Inhabited by Moros (Filipino Mohammedans), these 14 islets actually are under the jurisdiction of British North Borneo, to which the Dayang Dayang has presented claims of ownership.

According to the princess, she inherited the islets from her royal ancestors and she is the only person who could rightfully govern them. She says the inhabitants of the islets recognize her as their own sovereign.

U. S. to Prepare a Haven in Nevada for Wild Life

A 40,000-acre swamp and meadow in Nevada will be prepared for occupancy by migrating birds and waterfowl, Capt. Keith K. Tatom of the Fort Douglas CCC district headquarters has been announced.

The area, located in Ruby Valley, Nevada, will be the third largest migratory bird sanctuary in the United States.

A section of land about 16 miles long and two miles wide has been acquired by the federal government. The area is fed by many natural springs that will provide natural waterways and islands. It will make "ideal swampland" for birds, Tatom said.

The job of engineers is to convert a vast waste land into an even more worthless wasteland. Much of the area will be flooded, and bushes and other herbage planted to create the best possible conditions for migrating birds.

The valley is already a natural resting place and nesting ground for ducks, geese, pelicans and almost every other variety of migratory bird found in this section of the country.

Shashville to Natchez—was adopted as a permanent project of the National Park Service in 1938. Under supervision of the Public Roads Administration several sections of the road were improved under construction last year in the three states traversed by the route, and the 1940 program is now underway.

Since the parkway is particularly designed for pleasure and sightseeing use, there will be no roadside advertising signs, holding stands or any of the obnoxious structures that mar so many of our present-day roadways. To keep the highway itself, in tune with the unspoiled country through which it passes, the authorities are adopting, as far as possible, types of road surfacing that are substantial and at the same time harmonize with the natural surroundings.

The first part of the new parkway to be completed during 1940 is a section just outside the southern terminus at Natchez. For surfacing on this section, local soil materials—gravel, sand and clay—were selected.

Some authorities believe that the route of the Natchez Trace was used by DeSoto who discovered the Mississippi River in 1542. Four centuries later—in 1942—modern tourist-explorers will be able to traverse the same route for at least much of its length, if the reconstruction work progresses at the scheduled pace.
