

HIGHWAY DEFENSES PROGRAM MAKES TRAFFIC STUDY

There was new evidence this week of the emphasis to be placed on highway transport in Federal programs to step up efficiency in major industries both for national defense and peace time needs.

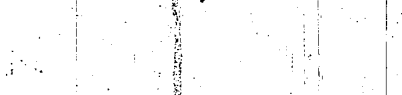

A new version of that popular old game "put and take" is etching wrinkles on the brow of a homemaker and laundrywoman alike.

It is thus that every homemaker plays "put and take" with her laundry bundle. Making a list and keeping it accurately would do much to save the sweet disposition of thousands of homemakers and laundrymen.

Being women, and having the unexpected happen to us every day, we'll still play "put and take" with our laundry bundle.

mark down the last minute additions—such as the apron we are wearing when the laundry routine arrives—the homemaker will have a written record of the transaction which can be checked immediately.

SUMMERTIME CALLS FOR SERVING OF SIMPLER MEALS

Simple meals serve more, than one purpose in midsummer. Such meals help keep the house cool, please appetites, and provide more free hours for the housewife who does the cooking.

Even when the mercury soars there ought to be at least one hot dish. Variety in this portion of the meal can be achieved by serving creamed ham, chicken, veal, or seafood in the center of a hot ring mold made of rice or noodles.

Next mixtures for stuffing vegetables such as peppers, tomatoes, or cabbage leaves appeal to some families. Others prefer vegetable and meat pie casseroles prepared served with some starchy food such as rice, noodles or spaghetti.

SHOERING ON DOG'S NECK SUMMONS VET TO PHONE

If you happen to be in the town of St. John, Kans., and meet a dog with a black shoe string tied around his collar, you will know that Dr. Ernest Baker is wanted on the telephone.

It was an expensive affair. He had noticed the lady with the dog, carrying it to the dog agency, and he had gone—she had discovered her loss and return.

The heaviness of the purse's contents created considerable hope within Johnny's heart. His tired eyes looked across the street—"Full Course Roast Chicken Dinner, One Dollar."

Praying that he might not be too badly disappointed, Johnny opened the purse, with trembling, clumsy fingers. He was almost afraid to look.

A powder puff first met his gaze. Desperate fingers pushed it aside. His heart seemed to stop as he made the discovery that the purse was devoid of money. Not even a dime nor a penny rewarded his search.

Hope dies hard within the human breast. After his eyes had reverted to the sign across the street, he found the hundredth ticket that morning. Johnny opened the purse again. His breath came heavily. His fingers discovered a small envelope which had previously failed to see. His eyes were the size of saucers a moment later. He was holding in the palm of his hand three hand-some rings—the brilliance of the settings dazzled him. He didn't know about the value of diamonds, but he knew the three rings must be worth much money.

A pawn broker's sign caught his eyes. He rose hastily. A clock in the distance was striking twelve. It was time that he filled the aching void in his misdeed with roast chicken.

A lump rose in his throat. The hand on his shoulder seemed to be choking him. He turned his head, to meet stern steel gray eyes. The stranger he had noticed before was at his side.

Desperately, Johnny forced his eyes to leave the sign on the outside of the street. He tightened up his belt another notch.

"Let's see those rings," he said. "It took three minutes for Johnny's hand to sway about, find a pocket, and finally emerge with the rings. The stranger appraised them with experienced eyes.

"Who are you going to do with them?" Johnny was so hungry he felt as if he would faint unless he ate soon. "Pawn them, and then eat," he confessed.

AN HONEST MAN

By JOHN K. DUGHMAN (McClure Syndicate—WNU Service.)

UNDOUBTEDLY there were others in Public square as broke and hungry as Johnny Born, but no one on the benches was so hunched up and downcast, so tormented with regret for opportunity tossed carelessly away.

He glanced at the odd bits of humanity about him; at the oft-read, crumpled newspapers on the benches.

The green grass of the park pastures of his old home back in Wisconsin. If he had only listened to his widow's words, he would not have sold the impossible dreams of becoming a millionaire and remembered the sweetness of Dorothy's laughing, teasing lips—the movies three nights a week, with a cool drink and a plate of home-made ice-cream at George's afterwards—hay-wagon parties.

What an act he had been—passing up everything that made for happiness—Dorothy's eyes, clear and shining; cheeks like June roses; lips sweet and eager for his day. His mother's loving adoration—his sister's good-natured teasing—the welcoming back of old Rover. Why, then, was his heritage gone? He'd sold it for a mess of pottage.

A smartly attired middle-aged lady, leading a blue-blooded Pekie, hurried by as if fearing her feet would be contaminated by the knights of the bench. Johnny half-dressed man, hurried by as if fearing her feet would be contaminated by the knights of the bench. Johnny half-dressed man, hurried by as if fearing her feet would be contaminated by the knights of the bench.

Johnny was far more hungry than he had ever been in his life. He was about to forget his pride, and ask the well-dressed stranger for a coin, when his roving eyes opened wide, stared for a moment, then blinked brightly. Springing to his feet, he snatched up hurriedly the black leather purse lying on the pavement.

For several minutes after resuming his seat, Johnny turned the purse over and over in his trembling hands. It was an expensive affair. He had noticed the lady with the dog, carrying it to the dog agency, and he had gone—she had discovered her loss and return.

The heaviness of the purse's contents created considerable hope within Johnny's heart. His tired eyes looked across the street—"Full Course Roast Chicken Dinner, One Dollar."

The stranger's handsome face became almost sad. "But that wouldn't be honest, son," he said sorrowfully, "You would be a thief. Those rings would likely bring about your arrest. You can't pawn stuff like this nowadays and get away with it. Being crooked is the pain at the end of the line. There was a square guy and look what he got to be. Just think, he once walked twenty miles—maybe he was fifteen—to return six cents!"

Johnny's stomach thumped at the sign across the street. He hoped the chicken was roasted well.

"What would you do with the rings?" he asked the stranger. "Return them."

"Johnny's companion took the purse into his hands. His deft fingers extracted a card.

"Mrs. Will Lexington, Cleveland hotel," he read aloud. "That is where I am stopping. I know Mrs. Lexington well. Johnny regretfully brought his eyes away from the roast chicken sign. He gave his belt a vigorous tug.

Even Bathing Beaches Can Be Safe From Lightning

England will complete a 20-year study of lightning this year. That have they found? They are still uncertain as to what causes the storms but they are able to make an accurate forecast of lightning damage.

Here is how Dr. K. B. McEachern of the Lightning Research department of the General Electric company sums up the results:

"We are able today to make any structure safe from lightning damage. Open land, like bathing beaches, are the most vulnerable places with lightning masts, and ammunition dumps, which unfortunately are becoming more important, may be made proof against the bolts of lightning."

The theory of lightning now accepted is that moisture in a column of warm, rising air condenses when it reaches the cool upper strata and forms heavy drops. The drops fall through the rising column and become so unwieldy that they are shattered into droplets again and the process begins once more.

As the drops are charged, electricity is generated and stored in clouds—the positive electricity at the top and the negative in the lower part. When sufficient tension is attained a lightning flash results.

Fireballs, however, which many persons insist they have seen, may not even exist, according to the scientists. The same has been too uncertain to believe, they say, they add that for centuries everybody "saw" lightning flash down from the sky, but now modern instruments have proved that it strikes with the greater force.

For every unit of electricity in a thunder cloud, the scientists say, there is a mate of the opposite sign in the earth beneath it. These charges follow the cloud like a shadow and when the tension becomes great enough, the flasher shoots either up or down.

It is because of this affinity that persons in open spaces are electrocuted so often. The electricity strikes through the person's body until he is saturated with electric current—then he is the jumping off place for the discharge.

"Lightning," says Dr. McEachern, "is not a complete waste of natural energy. Thunderstorms are in reality great outdoor nitrogen-fixing plants. They take a mate of the opposite sign of nitric acid, thus, thus adding to the fertility of the earth."

American Fashion Trends Due to French Recruitment Against some recent Paris styles, clothing is now making consumer opinion surveys before issuing new lines of fashions. One of the first completed revealed that 87.5 per cent of men prefer rubber heels to leather. Since heretofore only 60 per cent of men's shoes have been equipped with rubber heels, a change in shoe styles is forecast, as rubber heels now cost the manufacturer about 40 per cent less than leather and give longer wear.

Northwestern Boundaries The present boundary between the northwest part of the United States were fixed by treaty with Great Britain in 1846.

What is so pleasant as these jets of affection which make a young world for me again?
