

Coming to the CIVIC Theatre

A hand-to-hand battle in the intricate confines of a beach resort Spook House, with its sliding panels, eccentric lighting, skeleton-lined floors and thousands of other laugh-baunted thrills, is the climactic sequence of what has been hailed as the funniest Joe E. Brown comedy in years, the Civic Theatre's forthcoming "Beware Spooks!"

The problem of heredity versus environment is effectively treated in Republic's "Wagon Westward," which also will start Friday at the Civic.

David Cook and his twin brother Tom are raised in different environments after the death of their father, who is killed in an Indian fight. David, brought up by his mother, becomes an honorable and upright law-enforcement officer. Tom, who journeyed to New Mexico with his uncle, becomes a tough-going scoundrel, as evil and lawless as his brother is good.

Still as hilariously funny and warmly human as they were in their past five bits, the Dumsteads are due at the Civic beginning Sunday, in Columbia's "Bloody Hags"

Elliott, state superintendent of public instruction, is the latest figure of prominence in the educational world who has accepted a part in the Michigan Tuberculosis Association's 34th annual meeting in Lansing October 20 and 21. Dr. Elliott will be chairman of a conference on health education in which nationally known educational leaders will participate.

Tuberculosis case-finding programs within the educational profession itself and new teaching procedures will be the two principal topics, according to Dr. Elliott, who joins with the Michigan Tuberculosis Association in issuing a special invitation to school men and women throughout the state to attend this conference.

Miss Virginia Drenckhahn of the W. K. Kellogg Foundation, will take part in the tuberculosis education forum. Miss Drenckhahn has had health teaching experience for many years in scope. John S. Exposure Plus Infection Means Colds is Warning Grandmother was right about drafts and wet feet causing some colds, but not in the way she probably thought.

The State Health Department said this week that without germs or other organisms there wouldn't be any colds, in spite of drafts and wet feet, but added that this is the season when the germ population of noses and throats takes on an annual increase.

"Just why exposure to cold or wet may set off greater activity of germs already in the nose and throat isn't yet understood," said Dr. H. Allen Meyer, State Health Commissioner. "But there is no doubt that such exposure often is responsible for a flareup that results in a cold or other infection."

"Before exposure can cause trouble, however, there must be infecting organisms present in the body. Some of them are easily passed from one person to another, usually in the unseen spray of droplets that comes from mouth and nose. The common cold is just one of the winter infections that are spread because of crowding."

He was one of the first foreign correspondents to interview Mussolini and Hitler and to see in their ride an ominous threat to the future freedom and welfare of mankind.
