PREPAREDNESS for the unexpected

The National Defense Program is one of numerous situations that can cause a tremendous increase in the number of telephone calls. Some occasions can be foreseen—a national convention, a holiday, a World's Series, an election. Others come without warning—the death of a prominent person, changes in the market, a storm or flood. The Telephone Company must adjust its forces and equipment quickly to unexpected "peak" loads. That requires closest co-operation between highly trained workers. The ability of telephone men and women to rise to emergency is an important reason for this Company's preparedness to do its part in the Nation's defense activity.
