Live in Burrows
As woodchucks always live in burrows which can be easily identified by the fresh soil at their entrances, they are easily killed, by fumigation of their living quarters. Calcium cyanide, carbide bisulfide, or automobile exhaust fumes can be used. A tablespoon of calcium cyanide well down in each burrow will form gas to kill the woodchucks. If the entrances are immediately stopped tight with soil and dirt. Three tablespoons of carbon bisulfide on a wall of cloth or waste can be used in each burrow in place of the cyanide. As the carbon bisulfide is explosive and inflammable, it must be handled carefully, and the user should not smoke. Both materials are poisonous to humans. 46-1-c

Mayan Money
Cocoa seeds were the most commonly used monetary unit of the ancient Central American Mayas. Their value fluctuated according to their supply and demand. At one period a slave cost 100 cocoa seeds. Small disks of stone were also used as coin, properly incised. So green was the Mayan symbol of value. 46-1-c

Trailers Important
Importance of trailers for use in helping to move the vast quantities of supplies required by the armed forces is emphasized by Fred Boynton in "Industrial Finishing." In order to transfer material from the factory to the field, it is most difficult for the enemy to detect them, as well as for protection against damage or destruction by rust, the military trailers are painted with a lustrous olive drab paint over a priming coat for the usual army use, but for some other purpose of the service. 46-1-c
