"From Covered Wagon to Streamliner" — Edward Hungerford. Man's progress in getting from place to place with his bag and belongings is a subject of almost blatant interest. Whoever has traveled has triumphed and suffered. In this book we have the story of a nation's experiences on the road, told by a famous authority and backed by the indisputable testimony of the camera's eye.

It is the engrossing saga of the American trek to the west, from the first appearance of the picturesque Conestoga wagon to the latest glimmer of the modern streamlined. It is the story of infinite inventiveness, fanciful courage, and occasional outrageous chicanery. It catches alike the latest news and the old-fashioned and the classic fact that nearly all the railroads of the modern world had their gauge set by the chariot of ancient Rome. It narrates the thrilling race of Peter Cooper's dwarf locomotive, from Thruville whose boiler flues were made of rifle barrels, against a horse whose flues must have been better; it tells, through text and picture, of the glorious—and probably sleepless—nights on the early Pullman, whose equipment included not only overstuffed chairs and rare wood inlays, but a concert melodeon in the aisle. In short, here is the always-alive and often fabulous drama of transportation in America, presented in all its dignity and all its fun.

"A Tale of Two Houses" — Caroline Dyer. Bobby lived with his Daddy in the little house built on stilts at the bend of the river. Bobby's Daddy believed that Happiness and Gaiety are very important. He and Bobby have many jolly times together, even when they are doing very practical things like building a house or fishing.

Helen lived with parents in the Big House overlooking the river. Helen's Mother and Daddy are very important and Very Practical people — so much so, that they don't have any time to play with her. And Helen used to look down at Bobby's house and wish she could go down and play with him. When the rains came, the water of the river got higher and higher. Helen and Bobby and their parents have a great adventure when the river in flood carried the little house and its passengers to safety, to a happy ending.

Donald McKay's illustrations in full color throughout, make this an unusual and charming picture book.

"One God: The Ways We Worship Him" — Florence Mary Welch. This is the story of the three great religions of America and the different ways we worship God in this country. It will help children see the relation of religion to their daily lives and help them understand and respect religious different from their own.

Puzzled parents and teachers will find in the text satisfying answers to the many questions that children ask about God, prayer, and the sacraments, ceremonies, festivals of churches and religious groups. Many things that are difficult to explain in the text are shown in pictures.

The book is divided into three sections—The Jewish Way, The Catholic Way and the Protestant Way, and each has been endorsed by leading educators and national organizations of these three religions.

production in one plant than in other plants where incentives were lacking. Instead of the worker making $1.19 an hour, the average worker made $1.71 an hour in December.

It is a fact that organized labor could increase production in war plants by removing arbitrarily forced restrictions.

It is a fact that a chief handicap is the worker's class distrust of management and the suspicion that management is trying to "get something over" for its own selfish benefit—more dividends for stockholders and bonuses for executives.

The above situation is tragic. It is deplorable.

American boys are sacrificing their lives. Read your newspaper headlines for their names. Your son may be one of them.

Hence this direct appeal to the American worker! PRODUCE MORE GOODS!
And this to management: TEAM UP!

Quit the feud. Uncle Sam needs your help for victory in 1945.

Cookies a la Cupid

No matter how busy you are, try not to let St. Valentine's Day slip by without a celebration of some kind. The young people will love it; besides, in these war days Don Cupid is a hard-working fellow and deserves a bit of recognition. The celebration can be very simple, but the pleasure will be very great. All you need are a few Valentine cookies and plenty of delicious coffee. Decorate your table with roses, cookies and your finest china. Pour out the fragrant coffee and you're all set.

These attractive heart-shaped cookies require very little sugar and are therefore a boon to diabetics. The cookies are easy to make, too. The coffee used in the recipe gives them an especially good flavor. Serve with plenty of freshly-made coffee and you have the makings of a St. Valentine's Day party. Here is the recipe for Coffee Valentine Cookies. It's tested, of course.

Coffee Valentine Cookies
1 1/2 cups sifted flour 1/2 can shortening
1 teaspoon salt 1/2 cup sugar
1 teaspoon cinnamon 1 cup molasses
1 teaspoon ginger 1/2 cup milk
1 teaspoon nutmeg 1/2 cup hot coffee
1/2 cup butter
Mix and sift flour, salt and spices. Cream shortening and sugar together. Add eggs and molasses and ingredients, mix soda with the hot coffee and add. Stir in remaining flour. Chill and roll 1/4-inch thick and cut in heart shapes. Bake about 8 minutes in moderately hot oven (375° F.). Decorate with confectioners' frosting made by stirring one tablespoon hot coffee into 1/2 cup of confectioners' sugar. Or decorate with small candles. Yield: 8 to 10 dozen cookies, depending upon size.
Note: When rolling cookies, a little more flour may be needed. Lift dough after each rolling to prevent sticking.
