

Car prices aren't what they used to be. They're better.

Oh sure, you used to be able to buy a car for $500 without extras like bumpers and headlights, but when you earned 25 cents an hour and had a family to support those first autos were only for people who could afford new-fangled novelties.

It wasn't until something called an "assembly line" came into-being that motor cars caught on and running boards and rumble seats found their way into the barns and sheds of America.

Today it's hard to find a family with only one car parked in the drive. It's hard to find an uncrowded highway.

But it's easy — very easy — to find a second car. One for junior, the wife, or yourself. Each edition of your hometown newspaper is filled with Observer Want Ads that describe good cars — both new and used. These ads are placed by people like you and by men whose business it is to sell cars.

Look at today's Observer Want Ads. Look at all the great car buys. And if you should find a good job advertised, or a good household item for sale, that's alright too.
