State Bang's Committee Seeks To Tighten Law

A plan which would strengthen the Bozine law for control of Bang's disease in cattle, but which would in no way conflict with the measure, is being recommended by Michigan's Bang's Study Committee. The suggested cleanup program for the state, adopted after 15 months' study, was announced today by E. L. Benton, secretary of the state committee and member of the animal husbandry extension staff at Michigan State College. The recommended program has been developed to meet conditions in counties of high infection, as well as those of low infection, and does not suggest compulsory slaughter of reactors in highly infected areas. A proposed amendment in the Bozine law would allow movement of cattle within or out of accredited areas. Also animals could be sold from accredited herds without tests, according to Benton. Endorsed by the committee was calfhood vaccination where infection warrant its use, so that herd replacements may be grown by the owner. Recommendations also include a change in accredited herd rules to require a clean test every six months. Owners with accredited herds who wish to vaccinate calves will be recognized in a new classification to be known as "certified vaccinated herds," if committee recommendations are accepted.

Testing and vaccination work under this recommended program Benton said, would be conducted at public expense, and will be on a county basis similar to that conducted by the state and federal government in 12 northern counties. Local veterinarians would be approved by the state department of agriculture to assist with the work. Local county Bang's disease committees, named last winter have been active in promoting county discussions and presentations for county tests to their county supervisors. In counties where campaigns have already reduced infection to less than one per cent, these county Bang's disease committees are working for exemption from the Bozine law and better inspection at sale yards.

Farm organizations have done much to help the Michigan farm are loan of the proposed state program. They will assist in asking the state legislature next winter to provide sufficient funds to make the program effective as a state-wide project. Farmers having suggestions should present them to their county Bang's disease committee or their county agricultural agent, Benton suggests.
