Rubidium and caesium both give photo-sensitive layers for definite wave lengths, and caesium cells are an important factor in recording sound for the movies. Milligrams of barium, a most active element, help give radio tubes their long life. Tantalum is almost indispensable in the larger power tubes used in radio. Indium, in very small amounts, decisively improves the corrosion properties of the cadmium bearings used in airplanes. Cerium is used almost daily since elegant lighter flints are made from it.
