OUR INVITATION
I love to come to this still place,
Where deeper peace is always found.
To kneel as though on holy ground,
And feel my Master face to face

And He to me sweet healing give.

Government Runs Unique Breeding Farm In Vermont

By BAUKHAGE
News Analyst and Commentator

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Some time ago the world was startled to learn from Pravda, the official party newspaper in Moscow, that it was a Russian who discovered "weirdos" (as radio was called in the youth), and as if that weren't enough, it was announced later by the same authority that the electric light, which poor Thomas Edison certainly thought he had something to do with, was likewise a Russian invention.

If I over read, as some day I fear I shall, that low-cream sodas and hot-dogs were first discovered on a pleasant afternoon by some mysterious Maccus, and that he sat dreaming on his back steps, I shall announce to the world that vodka are American products and that the Volga boatmen were simply a prodigal of the CIO maritime union.

Meanwhile, however, I am reminded by the department of agriculture that one thing which is as American as America and which no foreigner had better try to appropriate as a home-grown product, is the Morgan horse.

Justin Morgan is immortalized in bronze and you can see him today standing on his pedestal before the main stable of the United States Morgan horse farm which covers about 1,000 acres of rolling, wooded country two miles north of Middlebury, Vt.

"The original farm of 400 acres was presented to the United States department of agriculture by Joseph Battell," Colonel Battell had long been an admirer and breeder of Morgan horses, and had founded the American Morgan register. The farm was established in 1897. The area was increased by an additional gift of about 35 acres by Colonel Battell in 1908, and by purchase of about 550 acres from Middlebury College in 1917. The land, underlain with limestone, is well adapted to the production of horses.

In the selection of foundation breeding stock, and in planning subsequent matings, emphasis was placed upon size and quality, and ability to perform the three gait, walk, trot and canter. These points continue to be emphasized. Also, every effort has been made to preserve adequate muscling and depth of body and to preserve and enhance desirable temperament.

The stocky stallion, original of the post-mortem effigy was named for its owner, a single schoolmaster, was foaled in 1793 and died in 1821. He (I mean the stallion not the schoolmaster) had a romantic career and he is the progenitor of the breed which as the department of agriculture says, is one of the few breeds of horses developed in the United States.

Justin was a "small, active animal of great power and endurance, with the reputation of being able to outwalk, outrun, and outpull any other horse in Vermont and the neighboring states."

He had the power to transmit these qualities, says the department, to his three known sons and the United States government is doing its share to perpetuate the characteristics for which his ilk is known: "beauty, easy keeping, soundness, endurance and spirit coupled with gentleness."

The first time I ever went to Vermont I was attracted to these plucky little horses. Later I learned more about the Morgan horse. He weighs less than 1000 pounds, he is not over 14 hands high, round-barrelled, with powerful chest and leg muscles, a proud head and a stout heart. He has done a lot to develop the state of Vermont and his adventures have carried him far afield. In a fictionalized but remarkably accurate story of "Justin I," Marguerite Henry tells how the boy Joel, who "gentled" Justin as a colt, later lost track of him and finally found him again and how Joel, in his cavalry uniform with a sprig of evergreen in his helmet, sat proudly on his distinctive mount when President Monroe reviewed the Green Mountain boys when they came back from the War of 1812.

The author has Joel say about Justin afterwards: "He was just a little work horse that cleared the fields and helped Vermont grow up. Come to think of it, he's like me. He's American... that's what he is, American."

The Morgan horse helped states and territories grow up, too, for their equine brotherhood went West with the emigrating farmers, and more than one American soldier was proudly mounted on a Morgan as he went into battle. General Custer rode off on a Morgan horse when he went out to fight the Indians, a whole regiment of cavalry had Morgan mounts in the Civil War.

BREEDING PROGRAM IS UNDER WAY

Now, "The Morgan horse breeder," Dr. McFee of the animal husbandry department of the department of agriculture told me, "have given more attention to the traits desirable in a riding horse." (Forty descendants of Justin became famous as trotters. Some of you remember such names as Ethan Allen, Black Hawk and Dan Patch.)

As the Morgan farm today usually about forty-five horses are under test.

According to the official description, the breeding program about calls for the measurement of each youngster at one year of age, at two years, and at three years. All are trained under saddle, and in harness and are put through controlled performances and endurance trials when about three years old. The data thus obtained form the basis for the breeding program.

More from the notebook of your Michigan Marco Polo:

We stirred up things with our critical blast against lagging state parks in the Upper Peninsula prompted by our personal experience in four parks from Lake Gogebic to the Straits. Now comes an interesting letter from Harry H. Whiteley, a veteran member of the state conservation commission and a newspaper editor at Dowagiac. Harry calls 'em as he sees 'em. He has been doing this for years. We can't recall when he withheld a punch. He has contributed thousands of hours to public service.

"Your comment as to Parks, OK as far as it goes, does not hit the spot," says Harry. "The lack of park facilities is purely due to a lack of money. We are obligated to operate parks with inadequate manpower."

"Until we get a different attitude on the part of legislators, we cannot do any part of a job in our parks... Everybody wants more and better parks, but no one pinpoints the direct responsibility where it belongs... on the legislature and (Continued on Page Five)

A Prosperous School Year

The Farmington Public Schools will open the school year of 1922-23 on Tuesday, September 5. Every indication points toward the largest and most prosperous year we have ever enjoyed. New teachers have been added to the staff and temporary quarters will be used for some departments until the new addition is ready for occupancy. Children in the kindergarten should attend the opening session as in other departments and attend with the same regularity.

A Hot Fire And A Close Call

With an inadequate water supply a thrill of apprehension was thrown into the citizens of Farmington Thursday morning at 8 o'clock when the fire alarm was sounded. The cause was an explosion of gasoline in front of the Park garage where Conrad Hammond was filling the big underground gas tank from a Standard Oil tank truck. No one seems to know just what ignited the gasoline. A fire burst out on the payment close to the place where the gas is discharged into the pipe of the underground tank. The driver at once drove up the avenue away from the fire to keep the 800 gallons of gasoline in the truck from exploding.

A Spot Of Cash . . .

or Subsidized Socialism is the name of the next scene in England's great modern drama.

The first scene was fast and furious, leaving the audience perched on the edge of their chairs. The main actors shouted and spent and spent some more, they twisted and turned, charging down the winding dark road, throwing borrowed coins to their followers. They shouted back that they were on the way, and there would be a pot of gold at the end of the road.

As the curtain fell, the caravan had stopped. The words were dark and the coins were gone. All eyes turned to the west, while leaders spoke encouragement and promised continuance along the road to complete socialism.

While stage hands change the scenery, the audience studies the second act. For while England plunges towards complete socialism, the United States finances the trip. It isn't exactly new, this wild chase down the dark, winding road. But everyone that travels it thinks they are different.

Leaders in England today, in spite of near total collapse, continue shouting the merits of social reform. They continue to debunk the proven prosperity of free enterprise. Yet as they wander on, they hold out their empty hand to the west—to the United States, that grew, that produced, that prospered under a system of free enterprise and individual initiative—and is still growing.

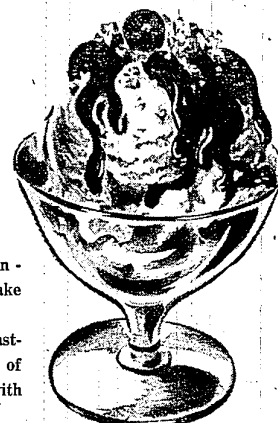

England, twisted and beaten by war, has been left with a tremendous job of re-building. The job seems almost insurmountable to most English citizens. They looked at the rubble, the cold of winter the drought of summer, and they turned to what looked like an easy way out.

They forgot that they stayed off the enemy with tools of industry—private industry; with courage, individual courage. They forgot that the money they have used already and the money they will probably get in the future, comes from American democracy—that very system of government—that way of life that England's government today is debunking.

The curtain goes up on the second act. What may happen before it goes down again not even the actors know.
