NEW TEST TELLS
IF CROPS CAN BE STORED SAFELY

Guesstwork on whether hay and grain is dry enough to store can be eliminated by a simple test developed at the Michigan State College Agricultural Experiment Station.

The test was devised by Dr. S. T. Dexter, farm crop specialist, and requires a small container, some ammonium chloride salt, and a sample of hay or grain.

Dr. Dexter's test takes account of the fact that must and mold spores need a relative humidity of about 80 to 85 per cent to germinate. These spores are present in large numbers on almost all hay and grain and are responsible for heating, mustiness, and molding.

The moisture content of the grain or hay is responsible for the relative humidity of the air within the bin or mow. Hay or grain which is too damp to store will maintain a relative humidity of about 50 per cent in the bin or mow, and spores will result.

The second fact the test takes advantage of is that several types of salt become damp at a relative humidity of about 75 to 81 per cent. These salts when shaken with a sample of the hay or grain in question, will tell whether the material will maintain a relative humidity high enough to cause spoilage.

Here is Dr. Dexter's step by step method to hay for safe storage:

1. Obtain a uniform sample. Try to get a sample that represents the average condition of the hay.
2. Bend or twist the samples to break stems.
3. Cut a portion from the center of the sample long enough to fit in a round, pasteboard ice cream container. (This is the best type of container to use. Glass or metal do not work well.)
4. Place the sample in the container and add a teaspoonful of ammonium chloride salt. This salt is obtainable from druggists. Place the cover on and shake the container vigorously about 100 times.
5. Place the container cover down and shake the salt into the cover. Open the box. If the salt is damp and clumped together, the hay is still too damp to store. If the salt remains in single grains as it was before it was placed in the box, the hay may be safely stored. This test should take about 30 seconds. Hayoline cases that are hard to judge should be shaken again. A little practice will make it easy to recognize samples too damp to store.

Grain can be tested in the same way, only using a half-pint or smaller container. Use about ten representative heads of grain, one-half teaspoonful of salt and shake about 50 times. Repeat the shaking in doubtful cases.

Dr. Dexter points out that the test can be done easily and quickly. The simple materials needed make it possible for any farmer to take the guesstwork out of his hay and grain storage.

Michigan farmers can help in the national fuel conservation program by adopting efficient feeding practices.
