 the great factors in his domestication, largely because we found him more malleable than any of the other fauna. And I think we have done a good job. We have not been harsh masters. We may be over-sentimental at times, but you with YOUR maudlin sentiment, you frequently interpret sound, practical loyalty, motivated by a high moral sense, as a slavish devotion.

"But I'm digressing (the voice went on)—what I would like to bring to your attention is this: these rascals of rascals. You men have some, too, and you have something else—traditions. They don't go back as far, but they are part and parcel of the same thing. Only many of your traditions lead you into trouble. In the first few months, while you thought I was asleep, I've heard you and your high-brow friends use phrases like, 'always been wars'; peace never has been maintained except by half force power'; men are 'fighting animals' and so on ad nauseum—(pardon the Latin but a Roman senator belonged to one of my ancestors.) Now I, with my rascals memories—can recall more of them which have worn thin and been discarded than your species (which I doubt will have a very extended destiny) will ever have.

"Just an example. With little effort, I can recall some of the silly shibboleths which made trouble for some of my ancestors. It was back in the stone age, just about the same time when we canines decided Man had reached the point where we were ready for adoption and training in civilization.

"At that period in pre-history, we had advanced to the point where we hunted in packs instead of singly. Our policy was still kill and let be killed although some of us had discovered its fallacy. We also had a long list of so-called hereditary enemies, and next to the apes, Man led them all.

"I don't know how many centuries it took to raise that list, and accept Man as a friend. A pretty stupid and cruel friend, to be sure, but one who could be trained. There was one saying, I believe, which was very popular, but which the mere intelligent canines knew was nothing but an old female's tale. It went: 'Don't train a man any further than you can smell him.' You would realize the force of that if you knew how far you used to smell.

"There was another saying: 'The only good man is a dead one, and even then you'd better let the jackals taste him first.' I could go on endlessly. It took an awful lot of work to explode those myths. At some as long as it did to get some of the cruelty out of Man. We've gone a long way in that direction, as you know. In another 10 or 15 centuries I wouldn't be surprised if we got you to treat each other as you would to you treat us. Your wars! Ugh! That shouldn't—and wouldn't—happen to a dog.

"At this point I stop. Muff at ways had been faithful, obedient and I thought not only my true friend, but also my respectful and humble servant. And this was going too far! Why this was important. My own dog, talking like that— I must have spoken out loud, for I heard something that sounded like a laugh.

"Now don't try to bust your chops at her report. That's all right, if you think I'm your dog, okay. Somehow I feel that you're my man. So let's let it go at that and we'll both be happy.

— didn't mean to run on like this and I didn't mean to get dramatic! I just wanted to say that I know my limitations. I can't talk. But if it's in the canine cards, my descendants will. It took several thousand years to write the race memories which would have dictated that I take a nip out of your ear instead of licking your hand. And, there's the hope for you, too. Maybe progress is just around the corner—

There was a sudden whoosh, a flash of gray in the night, followed by a parabola of fur as Muff left the post in one leap after the neighbor's cat which by now was snickering at her from the maple branch.

Muff came back. She gave me a hang-dog look and remarked through her whiskers, "That is one race-memory that I can't eliminate." And by the way, she added, "Don't mention this conversation. Nobody will believe you if you do."

 officials, for example, was linked to a similar term for county officials but not to members of the state legislature.

This now appears to have been a tactical error. Legislators were cool from the start. They warmed up to it reluctantly and only when political pressure was applied that the head of the party should get local legislative support in a campaign year and that the amendments, after all, were going to the jury (the people) for final verdict.

After asking legislators to do something for the governor and nothing for themselves, Sigler further ruffled their pride by appearing before committees and warning members he would summon legislators back for another special session unless they submitted his program to the people. Otherwise he would appeal to the people, circulate petitions, and get the amendments on the November ballot.

An Associated Press writer reported that the Governor announced, well in advance, a slate of seven delegates-at-large for the state republican convention in Detroit after he had assured the press that the gathering was to be "unbossed". Furthermore, the convention endorsement of proposed reforms was characterized by the A. P. as being "very lukewarm". Sigler's methods were said to be "unamateurish."

On the plus sign of the Sigler ledger may be placed in bold letters his traits of high courage and intellectual integrity. He still is the idealist, the reformer, the knight battling for "better government". He delights in challenging the status quo.

The governor's troubles come largely from his zeal and impatience to get things done. By seeking more power for himself in order to achieve these reforms, he has antagonized a number of influential people in the party, including those in the legislature.

Now that the legislative record is on the books, popular debate on the issues will get under way. The verdict will come in November.

Population Shift
 Apart from those entering the armed forces, says a 20th Century fund report, more than one million of New York's 1940 civilian population migrated to other parts of the country between 1940 and 1942, while California, with about half of New York's population, gained a million.
