VACATION HIGHLIGHTS

Drying nets around Leland. In the Grand Traverse area, provides the cameraman with picturesque touches usually associated more with New England or the Gaspe Peninsula.

ment out Sutton's Bay way, where you'll find Chippewas and Ottawas doing the most magnificent of basketry and beadwork, the men turning out bows, and the thrilling picturesqueness that you see wherever you find these original Americans.
It matters not when you see that land of beauty, my friends, for you'll get a huge thrill . . . Just as I did . . . when the trees are breaking into tender green . . . or when the orchards are a living blanket of white and pink and red . . . In the summer, when the lakes are lapis lazuli sea in emerald . . . or in the fall when, the gnomes with their fairy palettes have transformed the entire area into a breath-taking wonderland of yellow and red and brown and molten gold . . . a vista so lovely you can never forget it.

So . . . Michigan's "Land of Delight" invites you.

Who Owns The Forests?
Out of 461 million acres of commercial forest lands in this country, about one-fourth are owned by state, county or federal agencies. These are publicly-owned forests. Three-fourths of our commercial forests are owned privately, scattered among four and a quarter million separate owners. The greatest amount is in small holdings (155 million acres); the next largest are woodlots on farms (133 million acres), while large owners account for only 50 million acres.

CORN FIELDS CAN BE UTILIZED FOR FATTENING HOGS

Hogging down corn is an economical and labor saving method of fattening pigs, reports W. N. McMillen, animal husbandry specialist at Michigan State college.

Pigs usually make more efficient use of corn in the field than if the same corn were husked and fed. Success of hogging down corn depends upon the weight of the pigs used, season, character of the soil, and other factors. Well grown pigs in average flesh, weighing about 100 to 125 pounds appear to be best adapted to hogging down corn. Fleashey pigs should never be turned in the corn field.

Reasonably dry weather is best. Rain and muddy fields cause a loss of grain and possibly pneumonia, McMillen points out.

Pigs should be accustomed to the corn field conditions by turning them into a small patch first.
