WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(Continued from Page Two) visited his old haunts in the senate on the anniversary of Roosevelt's death. He led a procession of senators and secret service men to the senate chamber that way, he disclosed in the Vice-Presidential election. He signed the register under Cardinal Spellman's name. Since Vice-President Barkley was out of town, Truman also scribbled a note to him on a scratch pad.

"Dear Mr. VP," he scrawled, "called to see you to get some advice—HST."

In the senate cloak room, the President took a squat at the news tickler.

"They didn't have these here in my day," he remarked.

Then, referring to Washington's newspaper strike, he added mischievously: "I'm trying to get my newspaper at home. I'll have to read your little notes."

President marched out of the senate chamber and peeked into Senate Secretary Les Biffle's office. Biffle was recuperating from the gripe at Bethesda naval hospital, so the President sat down and scribbled another note. "Les," he wrote, "will you be here. I tried to get you to come here. You are out. What shall I do? Looks as if I'll have to consult with the senate—HST."

Not satisfied with just leaving a note, the President picked up the phone and called Biffle at the hospital.

"Hello, Les," he chirped. "I'm sitting at my desk, so I thought I would call you."

President chattered about Biffle's health, then hung up. At that moment, a call came into the office and Truman thought it would be a good joke to answer it. But he couldn't find the right button. When a secretary beat him to it, he had a fit.

From Biffle's office, the President returned to the senator's seat. There Florida Sen. Claude Pepper placed a hand on his shoulder and joked: "Well, I hope you're going to vote for the program of our President."

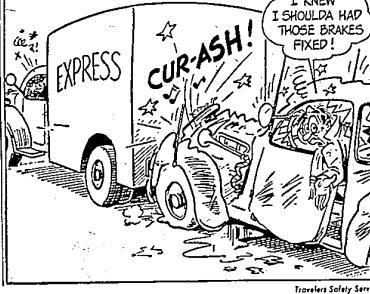

"I sure would," chuckled Truman, "if I had a vote."
