HISTORIAN REVIEWS ORIGIN OF COUNTY NAMES IN MICHIGAN

Names of many of Michigan's 83 counties can be traced, oddly enough, to one man, a scholar — Henry Rowe Schoolcraft, a pioneer who, more than a century ago, married the daughter of a powerful Chippewa chieftain and became an authority on Indians.

Henry Rowe Schoolcraft, head of the Northwest Indian Affairs Bureau, learned much about Indian life and folklore from his part-Indian wife, and published several books about Indians. In 1840 he was commissioned to name the then-remaining untitled counties of Michigan, and to these he gave Indian names.

Dr. Sidney Glaser, Michigan historian who is on the staff of Wayne University, has reviewed the derivation of county names throughout the state. He shows that Schoolcraft originally picked names for 25 of Michigan's counties, 27 of these being of Indian origin. Some of the names were dropped, however, when a feud developed between Schoolcraft and Charles O'Malley, then a member of the State Senate.

O'Malley's influence brought about a change in four county names to new titles derived from districts in Ireland. Antrim County was originally to be Meniscus; Wexford, Kautawauket; Clare, Kaykakee; and Roscommon, Mikenusk. Another county, of which the Indian name was Tonedagana, was renamed Emmet, not after a district, but after an Irish patriot.

Previous to Schoolcraft's naming of counties, several others had already received names. In 1829 when the Michigan-Territory began its bid for statehood, Andrew Jackson and his cabinet were held over as a measure by astute territorial politicians planning Michigan's entry into the Union.

Jackson County was named after the President; Van Buren County after Martin Van Buren, then Secretary of State and later the successor to Jackson in the White House. Branch County was named for John Branch, secretary of the Navy; Barry County for William L. Barry, Postmaster General; Berrien County for John M. Eaton, secretary of War.

In 1833, Livingston County was named in honor of Edward Livingston, who succeeded Van Buren as Secretary of State.

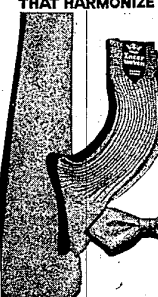

The first county to receive an official name was Wayne, named in 1796 after the Revolutionary hero, General Anthony Wayne.
