staff, would be the natural choice. At that time General Bradley had suffered a setback in the Battle of the Bulge following which his First and Ninth Armies were transferred to Field Marshall Montgomery and, with this added American support, Monty hit the German flank through Holland and stopped the Nazis. After the victory Monty's chief of staff phoned Allan Morehead, now press relations officer of the British war ministry, and said: "Monty wants to hold a press conference. What do you think of the idea?"

"I think it would be a great mistake," Morehead replied. "The Americans will be mortally hurt and no good can come of it. Go back and persuade him not to."

However, Montgomery held the conference just the same. British, Dutch and American journalists were called into the schoolhouse in a Dutch village where Monty, in a red beret and red blouse and with hand grenades slung over his shoulder, told how he had won the Battle of the Bulge.

Of course, the use of Bradley's First and Ninth Armies was not mentioned during the interview and Bradley never forgave Monty for this, as was made quite clear in Bradley's recent masterful book in which he told how, prior to the Battle of the Bulge, Montgomery remained rooted alongside the English channel demanding more troops while American forces chased the Nazis up to the Rhine, and fanned the flames of national jealousy to the point where Bradley couldn't possibly get British cooperation in the NATO army.

KREMLIN'S PROPAGANDA

French Communists have adopted a policy of cutting the ties on any American car that looks too prosperous if they find it parked in an isolated street. The strategy behind this policy is not so much anti-American as to make Americans anti-French. American tourists visiting France this summer should also bear in mind the fact that, if the Communists are able to stir up ill will between France and the United States, they will have taken an important step toward thwarting the formation of a unified European army—an army which Moscow fears more than any other single postwar development.

Incidentally, that's why Sen. Pat McCarran of Nevada, while making a great fetish of tracking down alleged Communists with one hand, plays right into the Communist plan with the other hand by curtailing U. S. propaganda abroad.

In France alone the Kremlin spent $125,000,000 on propaganda, which is more than the United States spends on propaganda for the entire world—thanks to the parsimonious pruning of the senator from Nevada.

Few Rabid Wild Animals Discovered in Michigan

While rabid foxes are a spring problem in New York, Pennsylvania and as close as southern Ohio, the conservation department reports only one questionable case at the worst in Michigan in the last 12 years.

Department game pathologist have identified few rabid skunks since the last three years in including one this spring in the Baldwin area. . . although they are positive the disease has been present in Michigan skunks for some time. The fact that rabies is a disease which kills the host every time removes the chance of an animal serving as a carrier for any length of time.

"Eliminating the stray dogs is the biggest factor in wiping out rabies," says Dale Fay, department pathologist. "Yet there is lack of public interest in enforcing the dog control laws now on the books."

"Vaccination of dogs in large numbers definitely has shown that incidence of rabies in dogs can be greatly reduced."

"That the disease can be absolutely wiped out, Fay cites England where the disease now is no longer present."
