'Any Deer' Season
Nets 100,000 Total

The three-day window of Michigan's 1952 deer season, when hunters in the northern lower peninsula could shoot any deer, came out much as expected and hoped for by conservation department officials.

With ideal hunting weather prevailing, an estimated 250,000 hunters took about 100,000 deer during the special season, according to preliminary calculations based in available information.

Hunters concentrated in areas of winter deer food shortage, so the bulk of the take occurred where thinning was most needed. Department game men regard the additional harvest of deer as a bonus to hunters certain to result in better living conditions for remaining deer. They emphasize that the estimated kill is only one-half the number that might have been removed without harm to the deer herd.

Although the shooting of does and fawns is new to most Michigan hunters, it is accepted procedure in many other deer states, some of which never had a buck law. The experience of those states is that deer herds can continue to prosper even with annual one-deer seasons.

Evidence from tracks in the snow during the last hours of Michigan's season shows that plenty of live deer remain to provide breeding stock for future harvests.

There was no significant increase in the rate of gun accidents, as shown by a comparison of records for the first three and last three days of hunting. Predictions based on the experience of other states which regularly hunt bucks, does and fawns were thus proved correct.

The department's conclusions are based on extensive information gathered quickly through roadside counts of cars and deer, plus detailed returns from 13 checking stations where deer were examined by game technicians.

Additional facts on hunting pressure and distribution of hunters came from "automobile and airplane surveys," in which numbers of hunters' cars seen per mile of travel were recorded.
