Sheep Can Be Insured Against Loss by Dogs

Sheep raisers now can buy insurance against losses in flocks from attacks by dogs or wild animals as well as policies that cover fire, wind and lightning.

This is pointed out by Graydon Blank, extension sheep specialist at Michigan State College. Such coverage is a standard policy, generally available from capital stock companies. Accidents by dogs are generally not covered by such a policy.

The cost for complete coverage is about 90 cents per $100 value of sheep insured. That cost is figured by adding the optional "attack by dogs or wild animals" clause to the usual coverage. The optional coverage also includes losses from accidental shooting, lightning, fire, artificial electricity and collapse of a building.

The coverage also is flexible. Blank says, to allow for increases in the flock. "The premium, however, goes higher as the flock increases in value. The premium, though, is cheaper when the insurance is taken for a term of three years.

The policy also can be made to apply to cattle and hogs. But Blank believes sheep men will be most interested in it because of losses from dogs.
