

Between Cancer And Prematurity

Clues indicate similar chemical compositions

Clues which indicate that premature babies have certain chemical characteristics in common with those of cancer have been uncovered at the University of Michigan Medical School. It is hoped that these investigations may lead to a lowering of the high death rate among premature infants and possibly to the development of an early diagnosis of cancer.

Working under an initial grant from the Playtex Park Research Institute, a research team at the University has found the same chemical substances in the urine of both premature infants and children with cancer which do not appear in the body excretions of normal, healthy children. These substances apparently are by-products of a sub-normal activity in the "life process" known as metabolism, wherein less than normal amounts of oxygen are used. Their discovery appears to confirm the theory that premature infants go through a period of low oxygen metabolism, similar to that known to exist in cancer. Thus, this specific "life process" may hold the key to the high death rate among premature babies, a third of whom die from undetermined causes. These substances also may provide a means of diagnosing cancer and some other diseases much earlier than now is possible.

The discovery of these clues was made at the medical school by a team composed of Dr. Bruce D. Graham, assistant professor of pediatrics, and Dr. Makopaeo Uho Tano, assistant professor of biochemistry, working under the direction of Dr. James L. Wilson, professor of pediatrics and head of the department.

Just what these substances are or what their exact relationship is to oxygen and other factors in the "life process" is not yet known. Through complicated and delicate laboratory procedures, the investigators, under a second grant from Playtex Park Research Institute, now are trying to identify these by-products and to devise a method for measuring their quantity in the urine and blood.

With these new research tools, the investigators will be able to probe further this possible link between prematurity and the deadly malady of cancer. From this may come the key to fundamental knowledge about the life process in cells and its relationship to some of the diseases and other abnormal conditions which now baffles medical science.

Grants now totalling $18,750 to support this work have been made by Playtex Park Research Institute at Dr. Wilson's Department at the University of Michigan Medical School. The Institute is a non-profit pediatric research foundation organized and financed as a public service by the International Latex Corporation. Since the Institute was founded a little more than three years ago, it has received commitments of almost three-quarters of a million dollars from its sponsor, the making of the largest private source of funds in the country for pediatric research.
