PROFESSOR WARNS OF ADMITTING GUILT IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Pollenses pays, but don't be too polite when you're involved in an automobile accident or it may cost you money and trouble. Prof. Marcus L. Plant of the University of Michigan Law School points out that a person who says "I'm sorry, it was all my fault," after an accident usually is in no position or frame of mind to accurately determine fault.

He warns that such an admission may be used against you in court, and there may be a clause in your insurance policy that voids that insurance if you admit liability, moreover the other party may have been guilty of contributory negligence.

The safest thing to do, once you have an accident, is to get the names and addresses of the other persons involved, the names of their insurance companies, their car's license number and the names and addresses of any witnesses. Then notify your own insurance company immediately.

If the accident is in Michigan and someone is killed or injured, you must inform the police and make a written report to the Secretary of State on his forms. The police also must be told if the car has been disabled so it cannot be moved in the usual manner.

Love may make the world go 'round, but it also makes a lot of people dizzy.
