CHEMICAL FOUND TO GREATLY BOOST TOMATO YIELDS
An inexpensive chemical treatment can mean twice as many tomatoes during the baby sitting days of the season according to tests just completed by horticulture researchers at Michigan State University.

Dr. S. H. Witwer and Dr. F. G. Toulson pronounced these increased yields by spraying tomato seedlings with chemicals containing N-ethylphthalic acids. These chemicals caused the number of flowers on the first cluster (potential early fruit) to increase two, three and even four times. Ten other different chemicals have also been found to produce similar results on both field and greenhouse varieties.

The increased yields were produced when fertilizer and moisture normal recommendations to provide for the additional fruit set. The scientists further discovered they could also increase the number of flowers on each of the succeeding clusters by spraying at two-week intervals following the first treatment. The first application is made when the plants are two to three weeks old and when the first true leaves have developed.

The researchers point out that increasing numbers of flowers for clusters might even double the total season yield if proper amounts of moisture and fertilizer are supplied. A tomato plant may develop as many as nine clusters in a season.

This chemical treatment gives the same result as hillside of seedlings to increase number of flowers on the first cluster. However, the chemical application has the advantage of producing additional flowers on all clusters rather than just the first one, when repeated.

Nautical Rocker Easy To Make From Hardboard

This little rocker is an easy-to-make toy that will give your youngster many hours of enjoyment. The sides are sawed from in. lumber with the ends of the sides curved for a smooth rocking action. Hardboard 1/4-in. thick, forms the bottom of the rocker. The rocker is just the right size and, when fastened in place, holds the sides securely in position. Two lengths of broomstick, 1/4-in. thick, are used as the sides and, when fastened in place, hold the sides in position.
