Oakland Co. Leads State With 291,610 Population Jump

Oakland County with a population gain of 291,610 between 1950 and 1960, registered the highest gain of any county in the state, according to figures released by the Regional Office of the U.S. Census Bureau.

The increase represented a 67% advance in population as compared to the state average of 22.6%. Wayne County showed the second highest numerical gain, 233,009, but this represented less than a 9% increase.

The state population is now 7,705,182, which represents an increase of 1,423,416 over 1950. Only one tenth of the growth was contributed by migrants from other states. Most of the change was due to internal growth, that is, excess of births over deaths.

OAKLAND WAS among four counties where in-migration exceeded natural increase. The net in-migration totaled 166,255 as compared to 125,355 excess of births over deaths.

An examination of the entire state population picture reveals that 67 counties showed a growth amounting to 1,438,730 while only 16 registered a decrease totaling 15,314. Seventeen counties had population increases greater than the state average and the 13 counties with the largest cities showed an increase of 25%.

In upper Michigan the highest increases were in Mackinac and Marquette Counties, each with 17% reflecting the effects of "Big Mac," the bridge across the straits of Mackinac.

The percentage changes indicate the uneven growth pattern of population within the state which, in general, reflects variable economic opportunities. As the economy and related activities of an area change, there is a tendency for population movement to respond to them.

IN GENERAL, population swung southeasterly during the decade while the population of the 45 northern counties (north of the Bay City and Muskegon line and including upper Michigan) increased only 4.6%, the other counties increased 24.4% and in Wayne and its four surrounding counties, the growth was 26%.

The southeasterly movement of population within the state has been evidenced for half a century and the center of population is back where it started in 1840—in the northwest corner of Washtenaw County. After a northwest movement for some 60 years, a reverse movement set in shortly after the turn of the century as automobile manufacturing gained prominence in the Detroit region and lumbering and mining subsided.

SPARSELY populated areas are losing out in the race for more people. In comparing the counties with the lowest population densities in 1950 with those having the largest number of people per square mile, figures indicate that population increased only 3.7% in the low density group and 25.1% in the high density category.

Despite the fact that the cities of Muskegon, Jackson and Detroit experienced population losses, the number of people in the rest of their counties increased from 41 to 69 per cent.

Origin of Term Wolverine State Still Obscure

Michigan is often referred to as the "Wolverine State," although the origin of that designation is obscure. It is doubtful that wolverines were ever found in any numbers, if at all, in Michigan territory.

We were, of course, once a major fur trading region, and wolverine pelts from northern Canada were relayed through Sault Ste. Marie to eastern markets. Some believe we may have acquired the Wolverine label that way.

At any rate, the nickname persists, and our University of Michigan athletic teams are even called "the Wolverines."

Our state flower is the apple blossom, chosen by our legislature in 1897 in recognition of the perfumed beauty of Michigan's springtime apple blossoms . . . And our official state tree is the white pine, so designated by the legislature in 1955.

WE USUALLY list "Michigan, My Michigan" as our state song, although there is no official sanction for that choice. On the seal are the words "Tuebor," meaning "I will defend" . . . and "E pluribus unum" which means "From many, one."

The term "Michigander" is of later derivation and is scorned by many of our people.
