The two Als are operating the newly opened Mobil Station on Grand River Avenue at Mayfield.

Tips on Gardening

By Betty Frankel

How Much is a Tree Worth? A large shade tree is a major investment, but pays, big dividends in beauty and comfort. One, well-placed tree that gives shade where it is needed can make the difference between a back yard that is lived in all summer or one that is shunned and deserted. A tree in front of the house can do more for the landscaping than any number of small shrubs or evergreens. Properly placed it should frame the house when viewed from the road. The overhanging branches seem to shelter the house and soften the sharp line between roof and sky, making the house belong to the world that surrounds it.

There are many kinds of trees from which to choose. The shapes vary, too. Some have small lacey leaves, while others have large leaves that overlap so they produce a dense shade.

Before choosing a shade tree look around at what is growing in local parks or in your neighbors' yards. Decide which varieties are most pleasing to you and which will be most suited to the place where it is to be planted. Choose a tree that will do the job you want it to do.

A CHECK OF local nurseries has revealed that the most popular trees being planted in the area now include the Norway maple, Moraine locust, and Mountain ash. In addition to these three, consider planting sugar maple, red maple, sweet gum, pink oak, or American linden. There is also available a new Moraine ash that is similar to the white ash but has no seed pods.

After choosing a variety it would pay to do a little comparison shopping. Small size trees cost less than large specimens of the same kind. Prices for similar sizes seem to vary somewhat from one nursery to another, and the shape and form affect the price, too.

Norway maples can be purchased from at least one area nursery for less than $10. These are small plants with a trunk diameter (measured one foot above the ground) of about 1 inches and are about 10 feet tall with a few small branches at the top. This is known as a "whip". It is bare rooted, light in weight, easily planted, and takes hold readily. A tree of this size is apt to be about six or seven years old.

A Norway maple that is about 18 feet tall and with a trunk diameter of 2 to 3 inches can cost from $40 to $80 or more. Prices vary not only with trunk diameter but with the development of the branches and crown and the general shape of the tree. The larger trees have the roots encased in a ball of earth that is wrapped in burlap. This is known as "balled and burlapped" stock, or "B and B". The weight is considerable and most nurseries quote a price that is for delivered stock. An additional fee is charged for planting, and the price varies also with the degree of guarantee that accompanies the tree.

AS THE DIAMETER or "caliper" of the tree increases, the price hikes sharply. A 3-1/4 to 4 inch tree could cost $90 while one that is 7 to 8 inches in diameter could cost $600. The latter would be a large, sturdy tree over twenty years old.

Prices of other trees vary, too, in about the same way. The Moraine locusts vary from less than $7 for a 1 inch specimen to $750 for a large tree. Mountain ash can range from less than $6 for a small tree to $145 for large specimens.

Use care when planting a tree. Make the hole deeper and wider than needed to accommodate the roots. Fill in the extra space with good soil enriched with peat moss, compost or old manure. Settle the tree so it is at the same level at which it was growing. Half fill the hole with soil and water thoroughly to remove air pockets. Finish filling the hole, pressing the soil firmly around the roots and water again. Leave the soil mounded up at the edges to form a saucer around the trunk. This will facilitate watering. Stake or guy so the wind will not blow the tree to a slanted position. A dose of rapid acting liquid fertilizer will stimulate root growth.
