The Distaff Point of View

Jerry Wendt
Woman's Editor

"Am I like that?" "That couldn't possibly be me!" Those and hundred other questions will whirl through your brain if you will subject yourself to one of the most unusual experiences of your life.

You will witness a movie with no words, no subtitles, only the strangest, most haunting music as an accompaniment. The only sound throughout the movie is a blood-curdling death shriek, which will bring you to your feet. You will never know the plot of the movie, the meaning, or just why you are able to see it. When the lights go on, you will see people around you, who are as curious as you are. You will probably discuss the picture with them, but you will never, never, know for sure the real answer, for it lies within yourself.

If you want a haunting experience and one that will chill you and leave you with an eerie feeling, go to Northland. When you are there, go to the "Concourse," take the stairway down, and stop at a small room called the "Salt Cellar." This room is hung with abstract black and white drawings. Make your way to the rear, and explain the picture with them.

There is no charge, and you will be seated in a rocking chair. Strange chords of music will be heard, and a colored panorama of a circus will flash on the screen. All the elaborate and gaudy trappings of the circus and the characters will pass before you. At the end of the procession is a clown, dressed entirely in white. Even his makeup is chalk white. This is the story of a day in his life and the many characters in the circus.

Memorable scenes are the one where a man, his face twisted with hate is hurling baseballs at a young negro boy. When the clown takes his place as a target, the man directs the balls at the negro even when he is out of range.

When the lights went on, I was standing, twisting my beads around my throat. I intend to see it again, many times, for I am unable to figure it out, or to forget it.

The name of the movie is the "Parable".

There is no charge, I repeat, but see it at your own risk. Some people have seen it as many as 20 times, and are still searching for the answer.

One thing is certain: you will not be unmoved by it and you will never forget it.
