"The Fox", an up-dated motion picture version of the classic D. H. Lawrence tale of natural love, has been causing controversy during its theatrical run.

Some members of the audience who have read the original story complain bitterly that Sandy Dennis and Anne Heywood who play the two women caught in the throes of Lesbianism are too young and attractive. In D. H. Lawrence's original the two women are aging spinsters.

Hollywood has a habit of modernizing the old classics to the point where sometimes the storyline wanders too far away from the intent of the author. In "The Fox" two such lovely ladies seem far too genteel to be running a farm and putting up with the hardships of a Vermont winter.

The nude scenes are done tastefully. Nudity on the screen is becoming an accepted matter now. Old Wally can remember the day when partially exposed bosom was enough to keep a poor movie like "The Outlaw" running long past its time with Jane Russell, never a complaint actress, gained more mileage out of her natural charms than she did out of her acting ability.

Kier Dullea as the wayward hunter in "The Fox" plays his role stoically. Whether playing the lone astronaut in "Space Odyssey" or the helpful farm hand, Dullea turns in a top performance.

WHAT WAS D. H. Lawrence trying to say in "The Fox"? What was the symbolism? Or was there really say at all? Was he trying to tell us about the predatory nature of man and how he savagely must conquer woman? Or was "The Fox" a very commentary on the mixed-up nature of mankind? Are we truly so lonely, so basically insecure that we will accept the abnormal love of Lesbianism as a substitute for heterosexual activity?

"The Fox" has been breaking all attendance records at the La Paristien so it must be the type of picture you discuss or "cuss" with your friends. The intimate, cozy atmosphere of the La Paristien gives "The
