HOT, FIERY GAS

Stomach Like a Furnace - An experiment in education in your living room will be undertaken by the University of Michigan by offering courses by television. In cooperation with WWJ-TV, The Detroit News Station, the University starts a television hour at 1:00 p.m. Sunday, November 5. Two telecourses, "Man in His World - Human History" and "Living in the Later Years", will be offered. Human history will be a 14-week course of 20 minute lessons and "Living in the Later Years", which is subtitled "Healthy Living in the Later Years", will be a seven-week course of 20-minute lessons. A third 20-minute section will be a telerout interpreting for the people of the state the function and scope of activities at the University. Students registering for the courses will receive supplementary written materials and reading lists from the University's Extension Service. Examinations will be sent students at the end of each course and certificates of participation will be awarded those completing the work. Students enrolling in this new educational medium will be cited on their certificates as charter students. Each 20-minute lesson will cover one subject and viewers will not have to see the entire series to understand and enjoy the individual lessons. Don't be happy - save your right to gripe by voting November 7.
