WITH FATHER'S DAY just around the corner, men's summer fashions come to the fore. Whether Dad likes the sand or the surf, this set is perfect. There's a navy cotton shirt with an anchor pattern and plain navy swim trunks with white stitching. And Dad is bound to appreciate the over-the-shoulder bag to stow towels, sunglasses and other needs.

Clothes Can Help Child's Social Development

Clothes mean more to a child than just "something to wear." They're part of his social development as well.

That's true during the play-filled summer hours just as it is during school days, say Pennsylvania State University extension clothing specialists.

Young children pretty much want to look like everyone else in their age group. They want to conform—not be different.

Anything that's quite apart from what their friends are wearing make them feel self-conscious.

So remember that a child wants to feel "just one of the group" and buy his clothes with this in mind, no matter how cute you think he might look in something new and different that catches your eye.

Fit is important to a child, too. Buying clothes a child can grow into may seem like a money-saving buy, but it may be a psychological mistake. Besides making him look different, clothes too large may be uncomfortable because they get in the way when he moves. And of course clothing that's too tight restricts freedom of movement.

A child also wants to be able to dress himself, so look for buttons and hooks and zippers that are easy for little fingers to operate. Providing easy-to-get into clothes is just another way you can help your child gain self-confidence.
