A newspaper is often asked to publish a lengthy obituary a week or so after the demise has become a matter of history. This is often the case, after the paper has published a death and funeral notice of the same. The Enterprise is no exception, and along with a lot of other publishers, we are finding it unprofitable, as after a first notice of the death has been published, only a few persons, relatives, etc., are interested in date of birth, age, qualifications, etc. Henceforth then, the Enterprise will make a minimum charge of $1.00 for obituary notices and believe that all of our readers will see the justification of the order. In any case, however, where the ruling might prove a hardship, the matter will be published free.
