

RUINED LOUVAIN, AND GERMAN TROOPS PASSING THROUGH AFTER TOWN'S DESTRUCTION

Here is a view of the ruins of the celebrated University at Louvain after the German invasion. This famous old college had a standing in Europe somewhat similar to the standing of Harvard in America, and its library, completely destroyed by the Germans, was priceless.

The town, which was one of the show-places of Europe, in its beautiful and historic buildings only the celebrated Hotel de Ville remains intact. Louvain was destroyed because the Germans alleged that some of the citizens fired on German soldiers. This the Belgians deny.

The Suez Canal. It is certain that in ancient times a canal connecting the Mediterranean and Red seas did exist. Herodotus ascribes its projection to Pharaoh Necho, 600 B. C. The honor of its completion is given by some to Darius, by others to the Ptolemys. How long this canal continued to be used we do not know; but, becoming finally choked up by sand, it was restored by Trajan early in the second century A. D. Becoming again useless from the same cause, it was reopened by the Caliph Omar, but was finally closed by the "unconquerable sands" about A. D. 767, in which state it has since remained. This ancient canal, from Suez to Berberis on the east branch of the Nile, was ninety-two miles long, from 108 to 160 feet wide, and fifteen feet deep.—Washington Times.

B. S. [The owner advised Max of the salary that had been paid George Bernard, observing at the same time: "Being comparatively inexperienced, we do not know; but, becoming, finally choked up by sand, it was restored by Trajan early in the second century A. D. Becoming again useless from the same cause, it was reopened by the Caliph Omar, but was finally closed by the "unconquerable sands" about A. D. 767, in which state it has since remained. Women Fishermen. On the coast of Holland Belgium and Northern France the fishermen are a familiar sight, with their great band nets and quaint costumes. Many of the towns have distinctive costumes by which their women can be recognized anywhere. Those of Maastricht, near Ostend, wear trousers and loose blouses while those of Ghent, near Antwerp, are dressed by shawl. They carry their nets into the sea and scoop up vast quantities of shrimps and prawns, with an occasional crab or lobster and many small fish. They often made out till the water is up to their necks, and they remain for hours at a time in water above their knees, rarely returning until their baskets are full.

An office boy in Atlanta, Ga., grew tired of pedaling his bicycle and fitted up a sail and mast out of a curtain and its pole. He sailed down the main street, causing a panic in the traffic until a cross current of wind from a side street sent him sprawling.
