wear a veil covering their faces, a tradition which many of their mothers liked.

THE COST and styling of bridesmaids' dresses was an area where most compromises were reached. Many of the mothers thought their daughters were being overly concerned about price, while many daughters felt their mothers were being extravagant with someone else's money.

The brides usually not only try to keep the price down, but they also try to avoid any dress that may look too "brides-maidy."

They were concerned with getting dresses that their attendants could wear again after the wedding.

MANY MOTHERS also prefer to see a more total look in bridesmaids' dresses. They still like to see shoes dyed to match dresses and white gloves, while their daughters are satisfied with white sandals or a dressy shoe and don't bother with gloves.

Most of the brides and their mothers seemed to work very well with each other.

"This is a time when most girls feel especially close to the parents, and both mothers and daughters try to be considerate of each other," Mrs. Marete said.

The primary concern of both mother and daughter is making the day as pleasant and as happy as possible.
