do not ask us to bear the legal responsibility but they would like the chance to look at the information about the various trips."

Rev. Hugh V. Steward said that he felt that undue pressure would be brought to bear upon those school officials who have to decide which advertisements to display.

Gary L. Lichtman took a strong stand against the original motion which would allow the advertisements to be displayed stating that it would allow commercialism in the schools.

"My concern is with all the unsolicited advertisements which would be foisted upon the children," he said. "Schools are intended for the education of children and should not be used for commercial purposes."

SPEAKING FOR the administration Lewis Schulman, said commercial planners were a constant source of annoyance and pressure to school officials.

He added that commercial groups were prone to play one school against another. The administration, he said would have no difficulty living with a policy that definitely cuts out all commercial advertisements.

The board eventually defeated the motion which would allow outside groups or individuals to post information on school bulletin boards.

They then passed a motion by a 4-to-3 vote which would not allow any descriptive material or advertisements to be displayed.

The no votes were cast by Corliss, Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Emma S. Makinen.

Mayors visit sister cities

Some parallels between neighbors were apparent at Mayor's Exchange Day in Farmington and Farmington Hills.

Farmington was paired with Flushing, a small town near Flint, which sent Mayor Russell M. Phillips, his wife Francis, and Mr. and Mrs. Phillip D. Bueche, representing the council.

The Hills was matched with Woodhaven. Mayor Joseph Quillico, Councilman Joseph Camillo, and along with their wives came to town.

Flushing is a newly-incorporated city which was a village with a small population until neighboring Flint began to expand.

Woodhaven mushroomed from 1,500 to 7,000 residents after the construction of the Ford Motor Co. stamping plant.

The two mayors toured Farmington and the Hills, meeting at the Botsford Inn for lunch, where the traditional keys to the city were given.

Stops on the tours included the municipal buildings, the industrial park, Oakland Community College, the Farmington Community Center and the restored business establishment of Lawrence Mayer, florist.
