Dior designs revisit 40s

By CHRISTINE WALDEN

Jackets with padded shoulders topping below-the-knee straight skirts may belong to the 40s, but Marc Bohan for Christian Dior has brought them to spring '75.

However, the collection, recently at Saks, isn't simply a jolt to yesterday. It is alive with refreshing changes in the spring '75. And its mixture of styles done in luxurious fabrics is bound to tickle a fancy or two.

Bohan's suits have always been good and this season he tops himself with a camel and navy pin-stripe ensemble. The jacket is that familiar style of squared shoulders, breast pockets and slenderized waist worn over a slightly n-shaped skirt. A navy knife-pleated ruffle edged blouse matches for a stunning daytime look.

A more classic look arrives with a bowed blouse and full skirt in a red, beige and blue silk print. The two pieces are completed with a navy jacket.

WHILE MOST of the collection consists of skirts and dresses, Bohan does do a spring pant suit. In soft grey the jacket is full and worn over a white blouse. However, the most interesting aspect is the ankle length cuffed pant, which according to the Dior representative has not been and probably will never be popular in America, though it is now Paris vogue.

Dior summer dresses are also memory joggers. One design in a chalky blue sports elbow length sleeves, squared shoulders flat winged collar and a belted waistline above a pleated skirt.

Another dress shows a softer side with easier shoulders, short gathered sleeves, a blouse top and less rigid skirt.

Of course no spring collection would be complete without its chemise, and Bohan creates and exquisite one for Dior. The dress is not as full as most and features drop shoulder sleeves, a tiny bow and a matching shawl. It is belted in the softest of shades.

By night the collection again offers variety. A long black and white shirt is trimmed with a ruffled and matched with a shawl.

Or other gowns are simpler with thin straps, ankle length and feminine prints in chiffon and silk. Orange, brown, beige and black stripes provide for a stunning evening look. The gown combines a full skirt with a camel top. A matching poncho completes the look.
